Rewilding in the UK

What is it?!

Rewilding

What Can I do?

A note:

Rewilding can be as simple as just setting aside an area in your garden to sow some wildflower seed – in spring or autumn – leaving part or all your lawn uncut to encourage wildlife (No Mow May), making a log pile, or not tidying your garden too much. You could also plant bee friendly shrubs and flowers and dig a pond to encourage frogs, dragonflies and even newts. On a bigger scale it could mean getting together with friends to plant trees in your local area, this could be in your local park or green space or possibly in the grounds of a local school if you can get permission. For funding and/or advice, contact your local tree warden if you have one, or the biodiversity officer on your district council, the Woodland Trust, and the 'Urban Tree Challenge'.

This weeks eco-goof:

Quantitative Bee-sing - An attempt by Marks & Spencer to "do good for the environment" by releasing 30 million honeybees into the British countryside has backfired, with conservationists warning the initiative could damage ecosystems and deprive wild pollinators of valuable food sources. At least their heart was in the right place, we'll get there!
